Frequently asked questions by the media as to the excommunication of the Ahmadiyya in 1974 reveal the underlying reasons for the Pakistani Government's actions. Perhaps, the best explanation of the British Government's position and the motivations behind it lies in the unambiguous explanation given by then foreign secretary Douglas Henderson in Parliament during the debate of the question raised by the member for Croydon (Mr. David Ennals):<sup>[10]</sup> "Hitherto the Government had tolerated and indeed had known and accepted that the Ahmadiyya community was not a formal part of the Jamaat Islami. But the Government no longer accepted that view. The Government felt that the policy adopted by the Jamaat Islami was a dangerous one for British interests and British nationals. It had previously been decided that the Jamaat Islami should be prohibited as a whole. The Government are now convinced that the Ahmadiyya Movement is very different. The American Government have said that the Ahmadiyya movement was their most courageous and effective opponent in the field of civil liberties and an indication of the success of their policy." When the Pakistan Government decided to ban the Ahmadiyya community, the fundamental reason for this may have been the desire to publicly show that they were stronger in Islamic political matters than the Jamaat and the Ahmadiyya. As President Zia-ul-Haq once stated, "If Muslims of the world believe that Islam will not progress without an Islamic polity and that it is a shame to see that an Islamic polity is struggling within the state, then the solution is to be found outside the state". While this understanding of the need to be a force in Islamic politics permeated his entire administration, it is widely believed that the passing of the 1974 proclamation was due to the latter part of the quote above.
